The illustration shows a substantial crate that may be made at very little expense and which, once well put together and properly cared for, will last for a very considerable length of time, says a writer in lowa Homestead. The side and end slats. if an especially substantial and lasting crate is desired, may be made of half inch stuff, preferably of some light wood. The bottom may be made of

The lumber can be got out by any ordinary sawmill, but you will find it best to have the work done where all pleces may be planed on four sides, so that they may be the more conveniently painted. I always paint my crates, and this generally I do before nalling together, using a paint with an excess of linseed oil that the pores may be thoroughly filled and so preserved against the weather.

By making a "form" on the workbench in which to lay the end pieces when beginning to lay on the slats more than twice as many crates can be put together in a day than where the "form" is not used. Nalls should be used long enough to clinch-on the end slats at least.

The Manure Spreader.

Many farmers consider their manure spreaders the most profitable machine upon the farm. This may be putting it a little strong, but there is no question about their efficiency. On the dairy farm manure is accumulating twelve months in the year. The cows usually spend a portion of the time in the barn every day. For this reason An excellent guide-book and map of the City of New York the dairyman has more stuff to spread sent on receipt of two cents in postage. on the farm than the "wagon box" farmer. This manure should be spread as fast as it is produced. There are some seasons when it can be spread by hand only on the pasture. Frequently the pasture needs it less than any other field. With a spreader he can out a fine coat of manure on the other fields. Manure spread by hand on the meadow rakes up or clogs the hay loader with the succeeding crop. Maoure put on the meadow with a spreader goes down to the plant roots and pever causes trouble.—Kimball's Dairy

Mechanical Skill Needed. The full benefits of farm machinery are not realized because the average farmer has not the mechanical training or the requisite skill to get the best results out of these complex tools. This has been brought home to us inour studies of pumping machinery used in lifting water for irrigation. Two years ago I gathered the results of eighteen gasoline pumps installed in a valley in the southwest. Thirteen of these had been abandoned not because irrigation by pumping did not pay, but because the men who bought this machinery were not equal to keeping it in
